JAPANESE SHOW THEIR PACES IN NATIVE VAUDEVILLE

The Japanese Young Men's Club gave an entertainment last night at the quarters of the club on Vineyard street, the audience being principally Japanese, and judging from the bursts of applause that followed every number of the program, the show must have been a great success.

The front lanai of the club's cottage had been transformed into a stage, and the front yard turned into an auditorium, surrounded by gay bunting curtains, and with no roof except the spreading branches of a giant algaroba tree, through the leaves of which the moonlight sifted and mingled with the soft light of the pretty Japanese lanterns that were hung on wires running up to the top of a tall pole in the center.

The scene was characteristically Japanese, and though the entertainment was not intelligible to the "haole" mind, it was interesting by reason of its oddity, and was evidently high-class vaudeville to the Japanese audience.

The program opened with an imitation of a Japanese telling a story, by a Japanese, the principal feature of the imitation being the imbibing of sake, much to the delight of the audience.

Pretty Japanese maidens discoursed the Oriental version of music from stringed gourds and tom-toms behind a transparent screen, and presently a great yellow moon rose with astounding rapidity over a piece of Japanese scenery representing a city, remaining transfixed in the heavens during the rest of the performance.

After the story teller a sleight-of-hand man brought out a chicken, which he caused to squawk lustily, so that the audience might know it was alive and well. Then, with the aid of an assistant, he made a great show of cutting the chicken's head off, tucking the fowl's head under its wing, and producing another fowl's head and exhibiting it as the one decapitated. Thereafter he affected to sew the head on, and exhibited the chicken to the audience, uninjured, calling particular attention to that part of its anatomy in which it was supposed to have gotten the axe.

A distressed individual appeared in the guise of a bereaved mother bearing a Japanese doll in arms, and from the emotions portrayed it was presumed that the little one was dead. The doll was finally laid in state on the floor in the middle of the stage, and the supposed mother plunged headlong over the edge of the lanai, presumably into a river. The result, however, was not fatal, and she was seen to get up and walk off towards the dressing room, effecting a change of costume en route.

A Japanese professor of juggling followed. To the mystification of his audience he hung a jar and a fan upon a hook fastened upon a screen, the said hook, perhaps, not being visible from a greater distance than the fifth row back. Among other astonishing feats the professor effected a complete change of costume under a table—disappearing in a kimono and obi, and emerging in American full dress with a silk hat.

Similar performances completed the program, applause being liberal throughout.

The entertainment was given for the benefit of the Japanese Young Men's Club, and it is understood that it was a great success financially, as well as in the matter of interesting the large audience.
